The Socialist Workers Party (SWP) is a communist party in the United States. The party was formed in 1930 and has been strongly influenced by the communist international and the doctrine of Lenin. The SWP is a member of the Fourth International, which was founded in 1962 by a group of former members of the Third International. The SWP's political outlook is rooted in the teaching of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, and it advocates for the establishment of a workers' state and the abolition of capitalism.

The SWP's organizational structure is based on the principles of democratic centralism. It has a national executive committee (NEC), which is elected by the party membership and is responsible for the day-to-day management of the party. The NEC is divided into nine national offices, each responsible for a specific area of the party's work, such as organizing, propaganda, and international relations.

The SWP also has a regional and local structure, with local organizations called branches. These branches are elected by the local membership and are responsible for organizing and canvassing in their own areas.

The SWP's membership is open to all who support its political principles and are willing to abide by its rules. Members are required to participate in party activities and to contribute financially to the party's work.

The SWP is committed to building an international workers' movement that will one day overthrow capitalism and establish a socialist society. It is an active participant in the anti-war and anti-imperialist struggles, and it supports the struggles of workers and oppressed peoples around the world.
